No comments: About Me I have an MA from a western university and have been studying the roots of the Middle East problem for years. I offer my book "African Trojan War" on this blog because I believe that it could be useful to learn more about the area. At least for western voters. UK voters are split on Brexit. There are many different opinions, but one factor that many may be neglecting is the language which is being used to discuss the negotiations. As is always the case, everybody's an expert on what they feel it should be. We get quite a lot of "no deal would be suicide" comments, as well as the other familiar "no deal would be catastrophic" ones. No doubt they are talking about something else of course, but they are clearly believing that Brexit is a binary thing. They see it as either 'Brexit means Brexit' or 'Brexit means remain'. They may assume that the only acceptable Brexit will be the one which is 'remain', and that no-one would vote for the 'leave' thing or they may believe that this is what people want and that's what Brexit means. They may think that they understand what people are voting for, but the reality is a lot more complicated. A study by the Comres pollster for the Electoral Reform Society found that 81% of voters, both leave and remain voters, thought that negotiating a new free trade deal with the EU was likely to be part of any Brexit deal, but a third think that this would be the easiest part of it. Whether we want the same deal, to hand away the rights we have in the EU, or something different is a matter for discussion, but people certainly do not think that we are choosing between 'remain' and 'leaving'. In fact around 60% of leave voters think this is the case. People want a 'good deal', they want the best outcome for the country, they want the best for themselves. Not just that, they also want a deal which benefits their areas. Not necessarily the areas in which they voted, although that is certainly a key factor. Politicians pushing this binary out of shape have just been looking at the divide between Leave voters and Remain voters and not at the views of the millions who do not fit into those categories. We need to remind everyone of the

I graduated from UK in 1986 with a Bachelor of Fine Arts in painting and sculpture. I taught in both the visual and fine arts departments at the college and high school levels for 20 years and now teach watercolor, acrylics, and line drawings at the Kentucky Arts Council. I have a new Masters degree in teaching from Murray State University. I want to share ideas, techniques, and experiences with other painters and those who teach. Search This Blog Wednesday, June 30, 2011 Surprise Package My birthday was last Tuesday! So to celebrate, I got a surprise present! It was fun, educational, and a lot of fun! I had my new sketchbook in mind! I decided to challenge myself and try to get a painting done each day. So far I am pleased with the results and this is my first painting in this new sketchbook! Welcome to the DianaLogs site. Welcome to a site dedicated to celebrating Diana's life, in all her forms. This site has been created so that Diana's fans all over the world can record their favorite memories, pictures, and of course, her very best song! I'm completely new to this thing. I'm a friend of a friend of Diana's son, Nicholas, and he asked me to do this. I'm a musician, and I love Diana. I'd love to make this a sort of mausoleum for Diana, to recognize her one last time, and for people all over the world to appreciate Diana's music, although I know there's way too many artists to list. So I was thinking, if this continues to become a wiki, then I can add all the artists I know, artists I've heard of, and more. So, I was wondering if we can all just make the pages for this thing to change? Anyone's able? Let me know if you'd like to be an admin, as well. Thanks all 3e33713323
