Molecular species of pyridoxal-phosphate as histidine. The solutions of the cysteine (L)-pyridoxal-phosphate (PLP) Schiff base complex, (L)-pyridoxal-5'-phosphate (PLP) and (L)-pyridoxamine-5'-phosphate (PMP) are greatly enriched in the cis-isomer of PLP, the coenzyme which in the absence of water, the cis-isomer of PLP is kinetically favored. The same solution is reduced in the presence of cysteine, resulting in the liberation of the pyridoxal-6-sulfide. It is suggested that such a conversion proceeds by the protonation of PLP to a trans isomer which then isomerizes to the cis-isomer. The solutions of cysteine (L)-pyridoxyl-aminomethyl-phosphonate and pyridoxyl-phosphate were also found to contain either the cis- or trans-isomer.

Before proceeding with the description of today's project, I would like to thank the many readers who are constantly testing our products. We have a lot of team members working very hard. As a result, it is our pleasure to bring you today's project. This is a really challenging project. We have learnt a lot from this project. I hope all team members will benefit from it as well. The first thing that comes to your mind when you read today's project is that it is simple. It's not. Today's project is part of a larger system for the most advanced LED lighting control solution. So first, let's see how we can send commands to any LED light fixture using a remote controller. The first step is to install an RFID module for controlling the lights. We recommend using the ZCKT-RFIDZCSMC2 Module from ZCKT. This RFID module can be used for controlling up to 10 or more lights. Note that the data rate is 1-5 MHz. This means, you can control up to 10 or more lights by using a RFID reader with a PC with a software like ZCKT-RFMAG. More on that later. The next step is to create the smart lighting controller project. The controller receives commands from the RFID reader. We can use the same LED module that we used for controlling the lights using a remote controller. When the controller receives the command, it can toggle the LED on or off. Also, you can control the color and intensity for the LED by controlling the ON/OFF and Intensity PWM signals. For a quick tutorial on using ZCKT-RFMAG, please refer to our previous post: Our next step is to modify the Arduino platform to include a RFID module with the V1SPD chip. The V1SPD in turn can read 1, 5,
