The world of The Cathedral is a mysterious place. A seven-year-old boy wanders the vast cathedral, no longer... About This Game: The world of The Cathedral is a mysterious place. A seven-year-old boy wanders the vast cathedral, no longer certain what he is searching for. The path before him is a maze of pillars and crypts, of magical statues and echo-y voice-boxes. As he moves through the past, can he really hope to find peace within the cathedral? © 1999 King Mausoleum (King Mausoleum, Inc. All Rights Reserved). "The Cathedral: Allison's Diary" is a VR horror game inspired by John Lasseter's "So Long, and Thanks for All the Fish" (1997) for the Sega Dreamcast. On the suggestion of the young author 'Isaac Allison', who inherited a diary from his friend Allison, the 'cathedral' of the title is to be recognized as the original author's home, as she made the sound in the game. Due to the ease of porting old-school PC games to VR, it is easy to imagine a modern release of this game. However, I'm not sure it would have held up to the nostalgic experience of playing the game in VR. The impact of the kitschy style of the game's presentation would have been lost, as it might be made less obvious that the 7-year-old is just a simulated character. On the other hand, the sound of the cathedral in the home would be more appropriate, as this was always intended to be a VR game. There were many different ways that the game could have been played within the context of a VR game. One could have had an on-rails sense of movement, with the only interaction being a turning of head to look around the world. Another could have been a third-person experience, where one's head was free to turn, while the player's body stayed still. Another could have been a first-person experience, where the player moved around the world, but only seeing their hands and feet in real life. I would have preferred an on-rails experience, as that is what I had experienced in other "walking simulators" that I had reviewed. However, I can't say c9d1549cdd

The if statement in javascript is working in that there is an alert when i specify a "2" but the script is not continuing to the next if statement (it also is not creating the new ticket).
