Stratification by ultrasonographic parameters for therapeutic choices in patients with renal colic. To evaluate whether stratification for the treatment of renal colic on the basis of pre-treatment ultrasonographic renal parenchymal echogenicity allows for better selection of drugs. This was a prospective, non-interventional study performed at an ambulatory centre. Ultrasound examinations of the kidneys were performed before treatment with a conventional method in 252 consecutive patients with a first attack of renal colic. In the case of echogenic renal parenchyma, the patients were given non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs) and in the case of echogenic renal parenchyma, the patients were given analgesics with or without NSAIDs. Ultrasound examinations were performed 24 h later in the case of negative test results. After this follow-up examination, 127 patients (50.2%) still had the same echogenicity and would have been allocated to the same treatment without stratification. Stratification by pre-treatment parenchymal echogenicity would have resulted in 141 patients (54.7%) being allocated to the non-NSAID treatment and 87 patients (33.9%) to the NSAID treatment. Based on this stratification, NSAIDs would have been omitted in 92 patients (35.7%) and not given in 64 patients (24.6%). Stratification by pre-treatment ultrasonographic renal parenchymal echogenicity can be helpful to treatment of renal colic patients, especially in the case of a non-responder or with symptoms that persist after 24 h. Today, Randy Orton announced that he will be medically retiring from the ring at Summerslam 2017. The WWE announced the news shortly after Orton's live concert in Russia. In a statement
