A: The OP also posted a link to a public instance on Google Drive. You could, for instance, copy the ZIP to your local disk and unpack it. The files inside are: index.html embed.html Your java code, plus any files that might have been included and referenced by the JavaScript source and/or embedded in the HTML. I suggest you open a new thread explaining what you have tried and what the code you have tried to run locally shows.

Q: Override virtual method of a derived class in C++ I'm looking to create a helper class for generating debuggers in-code, that can read and write memory, and usually does so using reinterpret_cast. To do this, I need to be able to override the vtable which is generated automatically by the compiler. The proper way to do this is to create a vtable for the new class and override it using the method table pointer in the vtable (which is a member of the base class) For example, the method definition in the base class might be:

void BaseFoo::foo() { printf("base foo"); } And the helper class might be derived from the base class (it has some non-virtual methods, but not important here): class Foo: public BaseFoo { private: void vtable_override() { printf("fooooo"); } }; In memory, the class is very similar to the base class,

except for a single byte in the vtable, which points to vtable_override: +---+-----+ | | +--^-----vtable_override--+ | | +--^-----vtable-----+ In Java, this would be implemented using a vtable. I've had some limited success with this (see virtual_first_table). Basically, I'm looking to create a helper class which can work with raw memory, and use a function pointer to override and determine how to interpret each of the objects. Then I'm looking to create a table to
