, this creates a situation where the processor may cause the read pointer to be set to the beginning of a long-term or permanent memory location used by the operating system, in which case, accessing the data in the permanent memory location will execute a processor interrupt, and cause the operating system to be immediately notified of the breakpoint. The prior art approaches can be used to cause breakpoints to be entered, but the prior art approaches do not provide a standard interface to the operating system for notifying the operating system that a breakpoint was entered, and provide no mechanism for serializing access to the data so that as a single data access attempts to execute the operation that sets the breakpoint, others are unable to execute that operation. A lot of attention is now being paid to the recently reported relationship between presidential candidate Mitt Romney and the Boston headquarters of Bain Capital, the private equity company that was the “forerunner” of Romney’s career at the helm of such controversial corporations as Bain Capital. While the press has emphasized that Romney had some autonomy in selecting what to invest in—even while being “partner” with Bain Capital—the press has largely ignored the facts about how the two partners in the venture managed the way they were in the business of ownership. For those who care to know the details, Romney and Bain have claimed that the transaction Romney had with the firm of Bain Capital was “a partnership,” even as he claimed that Bain Capital had no influence whatsoever in any of the major choices he made for his various ventures. Some have now begun to challenge that characterization of how the partnership was structured. For instance, it appears that Bain Capital did provide loans for some of the new ventures, and also apparently co-owned the Kittery Point Trading Post, of which Romney was the sole owner. And it appears that Bain Capital did have a significant role in picking the major projects for Romney. This raises the question of whether or not Bain Capital was a “manager” of the business as Romney has claimed. The same question could be asked of his role at the helm of such major corporations as Bain Capital. To see this, consider the famous anti-trust ruling that President Roosevelt issued in 1941: In United States v. International Harvester Co., 274 U.S. 693 (1927), the Supreme Court ruled that the initial decision to form a new business enterprise was solely the business decision of the parties involved, even
