The article is then taken out of the steam environment for a certain duration. With some materials, it is possible to pre-soften the article (i.e. already before the steaming stage). Pre-softening improves the quality of the manufacturing process by preventing warping. This quality is of course higher in the case of “deep-drawn” articles since there is no tooling. With others materials, the article has to be pre-softened when it is already placed in the steaming device, i.e. after the steaming step. This generally does not enable a satisfactory quality of the article. Indeed, it is generally preferred to pre-soften the article after manufacturing is finished, i.e. after the tooling process, and before assembly. This is because the pre-softening process is conducted in the same processing lines as the tooling and the assembly processes (the second and third processing steps). It is also known to pre-soften the article in a steaming device, and then to transfer it to a conditioning device which softens the article even further. Such a process is shown in patent document U.S. Pat. No. 4,580,631. In this document, the conditioning device is placed in the same processing line as the manufacturing line. It is also known to produce articles by using a gas rather than steam. In this case, the article is subjected to a conditioning process by introducing a flow of hot gas at high temperature (of the order of 1,000° C.), with a cooling unit (cooler) to maintain the temperature of the article at 150° C. This type of process has the advantage of having a 6d1f23a050
