In other words, it is a very particular case of the Glassfish problem. Our goal was to make the Server Engine as compatible as possible, so that other solutions could leverage this project and use it as-is, without re-writing. This makes it harder to optimize the integration as the performance has to be traded off to achieve a maximum compatibility level. The Server Engine has evolved a lot in the last year, so some optimization was required. For example, our current 10,000 lines of code can be reduced significantly. We're continuously working on the Engine to bring the best experience to the community, and to leave full compatibility for existing software. For example, in the upcoming version 4.0 (hopefully release in October), the Server Engine will support Java Persistence API 2.0 (JPA), Entity Beans (EJB), Java SE Java EE 6, and JBoss AS 7. The Engine is based on the concept of providing a high-level API (to be used by application code) and a low-level API (exposed directly to the OS), like HAProxy does (the old book on Unix Networking actually documents HAProxy as one of the applications leveraging this architecture). We aim for the following performance for a 1-million-socket machine: fast start up application start up spawning of a web application process resolving an individual page request not starting up an unused process reducing the machine start-up time Reducing the server start-up time Similar to the previous point, the Server Engine provides a high-level API for the OS in a socket-friendly way. Based on HAProxy, the
